The occurrence of the untoward effects of the potassic iodide finds its most satisfactory explanation in the hypothesis that the drug, or the products of its decomposition, exerts a direct influence through the circulation on the respective parts. The theory of the saturation of the system with the iodide of potassium, of which the symptoms detailed were regarded as the expression, and which was formerly accepted by most of the authors, is manifestly obscure and indefinite, and is so plainly refuted by the fact that these symptoms appear after even very small doses, that any further discussion of it maybe dispensed with. In addition to this chemical analysis points also to the local origin of the affection. It has long been known that iodine may be detected in the secretions, as the urine, saliva, sweat,...
