Not illustrated. 1896 Excerpt: .in the first experiments an effort was made to utilize as much as possible of the old writing. The Spencerian letter forms were straightened up producing a style, the chief objectional test some European styles, but these we found to lack system, and many of the letter forms are incompatible with natural writing movements. The apparently excellent results shown in some circulars are either mere tracings or pen-drawings, and are in no proper sense writing. It may be worth noting that whenever one sees specimens in which there is a great precision in the height and spacing of letters, or in the likeness of recurring letters, he may know the work has been laboriously drawn out, and what, at a superficial glance seems excellent, is really very bad, considered as training in writing. Then followed the development of the style illustrated by plate II. The connecting lines are more curved and the writing rounder. This we found to be an improvement upon the first, and with it our work became fairly satisfactory. The writing, however, lacked strength, and there was a general tendency to degenerate into the style which results from practice on the peculiar form shown in plate I. Subsequent experiments, however, showed that we had not yet gone far enough from the conventional idea of writing. Taking the Roman type for our basic forms we developed the system illustrated in plates III and IV. With the use of this style improvement came by...
