Not illustrated. 1906 Excerpt: . a previous part of this paper I have shown that copra, once sufficiently dried, may be kept during the dry season in Manila without any change whatsoever, but recent experiments prove this not to be the case during the rainy one, even with anhydrous copra. Two samples of the latter, cut into fine pieces, were exposed, in open specimen jars, for a period of one month. At the end of this time one sample was covered to exclude air, while the other remained open. The covered sample soon developed a slight mold growth and a characteristic ethereal odor, and at the end of another month the oil extracted from it contained free acid to the amount of 3 per cent. The sample left uncovered for two months was not changed as much, for the oil from it contained only 0.89 free acid. This is probably due to the fact that during the time of exposure there occurred several comparatively dry periods of from three to four days each, during which there was very little rain, thus giving the specimen an opportunity to become partially dry so that the beginning growth of any mold would be stopped. The covered and uncovered samples were found to contain 7.8 and 6 per cent of moisture, respectively, which indicates the marked influence of a comparatively small amount of water on the keeping qualities of copra. As shown in the previous experiment, copra containing 4.76 per cent of moisture remains...
