Excerpt: . . . lightcurve for a periodicity with a time scale measured in days, as in 1 P Halley. Experience with 1P Halley and P SWL suggests that one of the two fundamental periodicities that characterize complex rotation may have a period that is several (2 or 3) times longer than the shorter; also the amplitude of one periodicity will surely dominate the other if 46P Wirtanens nucleus has the elongated shape that seems to be characteristic of small cometary nuclei. Summary Based on the above comparative analysis, we expect comet 46P Wirtanen to have an irregular, near-prolate, shape. A large active surface area relative to its mass, making it dynamically more akin to comet Halley than typical periodic comets, suggests that it is very likely to be in an excited rotational state and that rapid changes in the rotational state are possible. These possibilities may affect the design of the Rosetta mission...
