Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from The Lady of Kingdoms Well, you can't get a word out of her, Mrs. Wallis said in an accent compounded equally of virtuous disgust and balked curiosity. No matter what you say to her. She says the child's hers, and who the father is ain't nobody else's business. And if anybody thinks they can go do any better, they've got my permission to try. Mrs. Wallis's hard sharp black eyes, set high in her flat toad-like head, snapped a challenge to the three women who sat about the bed. With a double motion that was habitual to her, she fluffed up with one hand her mat of thickly-curled artificial hair and pushed down with the other a perpetually obtrusive corset-steel. There ain't a drop of shame in her anywhere as far as I can see, she added irritably, turning to the woman who lay on the bed. Mrs. Drake, to whom Mrs. Wallis addressed this last remark, emitted nothing beyond a nonplussed, You don't! Who'd have thought Gert Beebee would ever come to this pass? - Mrs. Tubman took it up. Mrs. Tubman was a pasty, bulging, fatly-shapeless woman with one fixed dull eye and one roving bright one. Why, I used to think she was a real clever little girl. She was, Mrs. Drake answered. Smart as a whip, and bright as a dollar. She added after a pause, Southward always said she liked her better'n most any girl cept Hester when they was in school together. No one replied for a moment. And in that instant, the same expression dropped a non-committal curtain...
