Excerpt from Jess: Bits of Wayside Gospel Horse, now resented in my heart as a forbid den pleasure, a dangerous concession to the pleas ure - loving side of my life, the prospect of a saddle - horse all my own. It was a luxury not becoming to me, an indulgence which I felt I could not afford, either in point of time or in point of money. But there was no alternative left me, and I went in quest of my white elephant. What solemn weeks were those in which I went jockeying from stable to stable, from one auction sale to another; how attentive the dealers became, how ready they were to serve. Questions of color, size, and gait became absorb ing ones. There were several which my judgment approved. But early in the quest a six-year-old mare, a little undersized, but alert, clean-limbed, supple, nervous, albeit of the gentle, cosseting kind, had captured my heart. I tried to choose some one of the other horses, because this one was too expensive, too spirited; in short, too much to my liking. From the first, though greatly ex cited to find herself in the noise of a great city, at the end of the alarming tortures of a railroad ride.
