L is a small incandescent lamp, which can be moved in the tube, cd an opal glass plate and mn an iris-diaphragm. Fig. 1. The illumination of the plate ab is altered by means of the iris-diaphragm until the brightness of ab appears to be equal to that of some portion of the sky. The brightness is measured by the diameter of the opening in the diaphragm. With this instrument some determinations have been made in our country and also in South-Africa at a greater altitude above the sea-level. The results were nearly equal to those obtained by other investigators. In South-Africa, however, the relative brightness of the Galaxy was found to be a little greater than in our country. On the whole the instrument did not answer the purpose. First the bounding line between the two comparison-fields could...
