General Accounting Office, 2003 OCLC Number: (OCoLC)53874706 Subject: Government executives -- Selection and appointment -- United States. Excerpt: . . . The need to assign career staff to certain tasks that require institutional knowledge and continuity of effort was included in governmentwide management reforms proposed to address long-standing management 4 problems in the federal government. In September 2002 we convened a panel of current and recent executive branch executives and combined their ideas on alternative executive branch management methods that might address the loss of institutional knowledge required to perform certain agency tasks. We issued a report on the principle conclusions reached by the panel, and the need to institutionalize accountability for addressing management issues and leading transformational change was one of the panels chief observations. The panel asserted that in the federal government, the frequent turnover of the political leadership has often made it difficult to obtain the sustained and inspired attention required to make needed changes. This concern also applies to Vacancies Reform Act compliance, and designating a senior career employee as responsible would lessen concern. The Department of Education has given Vacancies Reform Act compliance responsibility to political employees responsible for other duties associated with White House liaison offices, such as serving as the person who interfaces with the White House. Reporting had not been timely. For instance, the average time to report vacancies for Education was over 150 days because the vacancies that occurred at the change of administration in January 2001 were not reported until June of that year. Commerce officials offer an example of how an experienced career staff person can effectively implement Vacancies Reform Act compliance duties and reduce the chance...
