Excerpt from The Beneficial Influence of Literary and Scientific Institutions: The Annual Oration, Before the Alumni of Jefferson College, Canonsburg, Pa., Delivered September 23, 1835 The influence of time and place upon the mind is acknowledged and felt by both the savage and the scholar. It forms one of the simplest and most indissoluble ties between man and the material world around him. It imparts to rocks and trees, to ivy-covered columns and grass-grown paths, the functions of animated being. By the charm which it spreads, the untutored Indian sees the manly form of his slaughtered chief rise from the ashes of the extinguished council fire, and the man of refinement holds, converse with absent friends as he gazes upon some relic, enters the sion where they dwelt, or the hall where they were wont to exchange their greetings. Its existence and its exercise are independent of the discoveries, of science and beyond the control of philosophic rules. It displays itself in the communication of pleasure and of pain; and bears upon the soul with its resistless tides of joys, or of sorrows, alike regardless whether sought or shunned. And when its force is spent, - when the emotions which it raises have subsided, it diffuses a benignant serenity over the whole man, like the spray of a broken wave upon the rock against which it beat.
