African nationalist leaders used to joke about a spell in a British colonial prison as being an essential rite of passage in the struggle for independence and leadership of the new state. This is the memoir of a district officer in Northern Rhodesia, from his arrival in the territory in 1944 through the period leading to Zambian independence. It includes a spell as Kenneth Kaunda s gaoler , during which a personal friendship grew up and flourished, and ends with an appointment to the President s Office in post-independence Zambia. This is the story of British colonial administration and the daily round of a District Officer s life during the nationalist struggle and the formative period of an independent African state and of a close and enduring friendship.
