Excerpt from Report of the Minority of the Committee on Military Affairs, on the Petition of the Legal Representaives of Antonio Pacheco, Praying Compensation for a Slave, 1848 Thus a military officer may undoubtedly bind his government, so far as may be necessary to provide the men under his command with the ordinary rations to sustain them, if not provided by the other agents of government; but if they be furnished by the government, and the officer purchases, upon the public credit, wines, or chocolate, or other luxuries, such contract places the government under no moral or legal obligation to pay for them. The rule in regard to military officers is nearly the same as that in civil life. While the agent acts strictly within the limits of his authority he binds his principal, but when he transcends his authority his acts become his own, for which he alone is liable. These principles have been so often decided that it would seem useless to quote precedents. And now, admitting this man Lewis to have been the property of the petitioner, had the officer who sent him west of the Mississippi legal authority to bind his government by such act? Had the same officer taken the horse or the ox of the petitioner and sent him west of the Mississippi, in the same manner, would the government have been bound to pay for him? Certainly not. The officer, if necessary to transport his baggage or provisions, would have possessed authority to hire, or even to purchase, or to impress into the service horses or oxen for that purpose. But he had no authority to hire, purchase, or impress a horse or ox...
