Purchasers can usually download a free scanned copy of the original book (without typos) from the publisher. Not indexed. Not illustrated. 1829 edition. Excerpt: . . . I interpose the word else. This is part of an obsolete verb, signifying, to dismiss, to turn out, to take away. And the sentence is thus resolved: The ship was well manned, take away that (take away the cause, the effect is taken away also) she would have been lost. Other conjunctions, of the disjunctive kind, as they are called, would here have answered the same purpose with else. The ship was well manned, otherwise, she would have been lost. Otherwise here is precisely of the same import as else. The ship was well manned; that being dismissed, that being other than it was; it would have been lost. The ship was well manned, or it would have been lost. Or, in German order, is other. The resolution of this sentence, therefore, is the same as the former. In the second of the two examples, Unless the ship had been well manned, it would have been lost, the contrivance is the same, with a mere change of position. Unless, is a word of the same import, rather the same word, as else. Unless is Prefixed to the conditioning predication, whereas else is Suffixed; and that is the difference. The word except, which signifies take away, may be substituted for unless. A peculiar application of if (give) may here also be exemplified. If with the negative, (if not,) has a similar signification with unless, except; If the ship had not been well manned, and...
