Not illustrated. 1882 Excerpt: .the radiating joints being tightened up and held together by means of a key of hard wood with both extremities thickened out, and somewhat resembling in shape the head of a framing hammer. Handrail Joint.-- Usually a butt joint secured with a joint screw, otherwise handrail screw, which has a right and left hand thread each working in a nut with notches, both the nuts being buried in holes sunk near the ends of the two lengths of rail. By turning the nuts the joint is tightened up, after which the holes are stopped with pieces of wood to match, and the mouldings of the handrail finished off with handrail planes. Sometimes, however, the connection is made with a splice joint, which is a species of scarf, the planes of junction being horizontal and vertical when the rail is in position. Heading Joint is formed between lengths of handrails, and of boards, c, connected end to end, and is either square, cross grooved or tongued, splayed or bevelled, rebated and tongued, or forked. In dados and similar glued-up work it is glued. Hinge Joint.--A general term for many joints that turn or, in other words, that open and close by means of ligaments of any degree of plainness and elaborateness called hinges alias gemmels in mediseval times) which are fixed on or near the surfaces of contact either to bring them together or to part them as desired. Hinging and hanging are with the joiner almost correlative...
