Excerpt from The Coraddi, Vol. 35: October, 1930 Wolf moran, professional gunman, had just arrived in the land Of the departed. A rope with a running noose had been the means Of getting him there. Electricity may be a more modern method, but in Wolf s case the Older way had proved quite efficacious. He had been conscious for a long time before he had any desire to move, speak, or see. He lay very still, remembering how he had ?oated through shining space and come gently to rest in the place where he now lay. Dimly he knew that he was dead, that the world to which he was awakening was a new one to him. At length, with out opening his eyes, he slowly extended his left arm. His hand touched something soft that bent under its weight. Wolf s agile fingers traced the outline. A ?ower, he decided, a ?ower like a small, wrinkled cup on a slender stalk. Is it red? He wondered. He drew his arm back and lay still thinking. What was it that had been SO red? Something that had stuck unpleasantly to his hands, he remembered. But the word was lost to his mind. Slowly the mistiness faded from his thoughts. He sat up, opened his eyes, and stared into the thick darkness that pressed about him. In the stillness he heard little leaves rustling in the breeze. Wolf got to his feet and ran a cautious finger around his throat. Finding that it did not hurt, he clasped a hand On either side Of his neck and twisted his head from side to side. For all practical purposes his neck was unharmed....
