Excerpt: . was felt that this was an unfriendly message and one which assailed the whole position of Great Britain in South Africa. As a result of the warning Great Britain prepared for war. The crisis was averted, but it evoked a tempest of patriotic feeling never before experienced during this generation. Meanwhile the promoters of the Reform movement in the Transvaal, numbering sixty-four, all men of wealth and influence in Johannesburg, were arrested and put in prison in Pretoria. They were tried in May. The four leaders, Mr. Lionel Phillips, Mr. George Farrar, Mr. John Hays Hammond, and Colonel Rhodes, were sentenced to death. This sentence was almost immediately commuted to a long term of imprisonment, and finally to payment of a heavy fine. The sentence of imprisonment passed on the other Reformers was also similarly commuted. A Time of Trouble. The political disturbances in the Transvaal heralded a period of disaster to Natal, in common with the rest of South Africa. On the last day of 1895 a terrible railway accident took place on the Natal line near Glencoe, whereby forty persons lost their lives and many were seriously injured. The passengers were mostly women and children sent away from possible disturbance in Johannesburg. The line had been opened through to Johannesburg from Durban in November. In February 1896, eight trucks full of dynamite exploded in the station of Vredendorp, a working suburb of Johannesburg. A hole was torn in the earth 30...
