ILATIoN.--We have learned why the air of our sleeping-rooms, schoolrooms, and public buildings is often impure. Now let us inquire how we can keep the air pure in our rooms without danger of our taking cold. n the summer this is an easy matter, as the doors and windows are almost always open. When our windows are of the common sash kind (Fig. 38), a good supply of fresh air may be obtained without a draught by placing a board about four inches wide under the lower sash. The window is thus closed against rain and snow, but allows a supply of fresh air to enter between the sashes. If we open the windows or doors at opposite sides of the room, the bad air will be carried ofi, and pure air will take its place. If we have but one window in the room, it is a good plan to open it l l at the top as well as i at the bottom, a little l, way even in very l ; cold weather. The l bad air, so long as it is warm, is lighter, than the pure air i and rises to the top of the room. For Fm. 38.--Showing manner of ventilating by in- -serting strip of wood beneath lower sash of this reason It will go window. out at the top of the window, while the pure air, being heavier, comes...
