It is, therefore, much to be regretted that he who accomplished so arduous an undertaking, was rewarded, except by a few intelligent and spirited individuals, with treachery, ingratitude, and neglect. In the prosecution of his plans, the best of his days were spent; lucrative engagements abandoned; and his private means, and even those of his family, expended. He lived to see that realised which, before he showed its practicability, was generally reckoned chimerical: and to observe others reaping the fruits of his labours, without the honesty to acknowledge to whom they were indebted. The following narrative is drawn up from a memorial presented to the Lords of His Majesty s Treasury, in behalf of William Symington; and from documents in the possession of his family....
