Excerpt from The Prologue, a Pamphlet: Consisting of Contributions From Graduates of Several Universities: Prose and Some Verse It was about six O clock and the chimes were just ring ing from the chapel bells. It was the time when the sun lights the college towers and the elm tops, and the shadows slant farthest on the Green; the familiar hour when from the campus entries the students are sauntering lazily toward supper, when nobody hurries but the paper boys and the distant street pianos tinkle pleasantly, while groups Of three or four straying down the dim, elm-lined streets try harmonies and fail, laughing, at the high notes. It was very natural to be strolling again hands over shoulders, their business stride fallen easily back in to the Old undergraduate 1011. Pleasant recollections plucked them all into a ?ush of careless gaiety, Old jokes cracked with new fire, Old tunes hummed themselves, every now and then a classmate would dash across the street and shake hands and Slap backs all around. It was, By gad, it s Jimmy Lawrence, and Jimmy would have a budding double chin to laugh at or perhaps an exceed ing fine moustache. The Deacon, said Jim, is a reprobate. He has gotten to Mrs. Markham s first and the rascal is telling her all the slander he knows about us. It will be good to see the Old boy again, one added. I can hear his.
