Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Herbaceous Perennials: With Lists of Varieties for Special Purposes and Districts There is much to interest an observant gardener in noting the differences in habit of growth and colour of foliage of the plants as the young growth appears early in the spring. The bronzy colour of the peony, the bluish leaves of the Virginian bluebell, and the sword-like leaves of the iris illustrate this, but indeed each species has its own habit and can be recognized as soon as it pushes through the ground. In a well planned perennial border there should be bloom from early spring until late fall. This needs care and thought but, like everything else, the pleasure derived from successful achievement more than compensates for the work done. In a small garden there is frequently no choice of position and following the line of the fence is the obvious place. A position in the open, away from the roots of trees, is best, though shade during part of the day is beneficial to some plants. The width of the bed depends on the length and also on the size of the garden. From five to ten feet is generally recommended. The edge should be straight if the lot is small and rectangular, but a curved edge frequently is effective in a larger space. If the ground is of different levels, or if there are any special permanent features, note should be made of them and the border planned to emphasize these points of interest. When the position is selected the soil must be considered. As the border is expected to remain for some years the soil must be well prepared. The best way to do this is...
