Excerpt from The Latter-Day Saints Millennial Star, Vol. 85: April 12, 1923 Mr. Babson, the well-known statistician, speaks of a visit he made to South America, and how, after traveling two hundred miles inland from the coast, he came to a squalid Indian village where lived a small tribe in abject poverty. Their village was located at the base of a great water power which he was assured by competent engineers could develop ten or fifteen million horse power for every month in the year, and yet here lived this little band of Indians plowing the ground with crooked sticks, carrying burdens on their backs two hundred miles from the sea coast; when, with a little vision, and with a little work, they might have transformed the spot where they lived into a veritable Eden.
