Excerpt from Brief Lessons on the Human Body: An Elementary d104-Book on Anatomy, Physiology, Hygiene, and the Effects of Stimulants and Narcotics on the Human System, Prepared for the Use of Intermediate and Grammar Schools This book is the result of several years practical work in the class-room. It has been the practice of the author to teach the subject of Physiology topically, objectively, and with such Simple experiments as can be performed with inexpensive apparatus. The notes prepared for the use of pupils have been revised and extended from time to time, until they have grown into the substance of this little book. In its preparation a logical order has been Observed in the arrangement of subjects and in the sequence of topics, so that each lesson may be presented to the class orally and objectively before being assigned from the text. The sub jct of each topic has been placed in the form of a question. Each question is a useful and interesting question, and deals with some important fact in regard to the structure or function of some of the...
