The day set apart for our good ought surely to be made the best and brightest of the seven. To do this, it must be planned for carefully. The father s business and the mother s household work must be so arranged as to give time to the children. Put the house in order, so that there shall be a bright Sunday-look about everything. Search out through the week some good and entertaining books for the older ones to read, and picture-books for the little ones. Make a distinction between the reading and the plays (for children must play) on Sundays and week-days. In a certain home, not imaginary but real, in which the day is truly a delight, for each child there is...
