Not the bottom of the rap game, like Drake suggested in his uplifting and rousing anthemic song, but rather starting from the bottom of the creative ladder. The book isn't only about a 20-something-year-old artist trying to mischievously and cleverly climb his way to top of the art world by manipulating galleries. It's a self-induced psychological experiment where the author accidentally found a way to break his limitations and the psychological trappings of his mind. He became an introvert that was capable of going outside of himself in order to accomplish things he thought he wasn't capable of. He was able to create a new narrative for himself that expanded his definition of being an introvert because of the process he went through to write this book. He was able to expand and grow simply because his definition of who he is expanded.
