Excerpt from The Statue Erected by the State of New Hampshire in Honor of General John Stark: A Sketch of Its Inception, Erection and Dedication Nor is this expression of public taste confined wholly to architectural circles. The celebration of our national centennial and the recurrence of similar local anniversaries have served to concentrate the mind of the community upon the central figures of our early history, and the feeling of common gratitude must seek expression in public praise. Hence we find, on every hand, almost numberless monuments and public works that are at once patriotic in their tone, elevating in their tendencies, and artistic in their conception. And who may say that each of these works does not convey its own lesson Why may not our youth, by beholding the inspiring works of an inspired artist, receive a lesson of greater patriotic import than any that may be inculcated in the schools The Greeks, by constantly keeping before their eyes the purest models of a merely physical existence, were enabled to produce a race whose equal has never...
