Hebden Bridge: A Sense of Belonging

By Paul Barker

Frances Lincoln Publishers Ltd. Hardback. Book Condition: new. BRAND NEW, Hebden Bridge: A Sense of Belonging, Paul Barker, Nestling in its narrow Pennine valley at the Bronte end of Yorkshire, Hebden Bridge is an enigma. Over the twentieth century, this small town's industrial roots slowly dried up. But then, from the 1970s onwards, it was colonized by waves of artists, bohemians, New Age enthusiasts, media types and an increasingly affluent, left-leaning population. What makes Hebden Bridge the remarkable place it has become? Social historian Paul Barker grew up here and has a keen sense of belonging. So he is perfectly placed to chronicle and analyse both the changes and the continuities that make Hebden Bridge special. His lively, colourful portrayal mixes personal and family memories with interviews, investigation and criticism. In his explorations, he meets, among others, a husband-and-wife puppet theatre company, the brass band, a local tattoo artist and a plain-speaking grave-digger. Each adds a unique piece to the social patchwork. Hebden Bridge is variously lauded and decried as 'the fourth funkiest place on the planet', 'Suicide Central', 'the little town that time forgot' and 'the lesbian capital of Britain'. Such descriptions irritate, even alienate, the families who've lived...
