A deafening uproar -- the cracking of wood and glass, the grating and crushing of iron, and the pitiful cries of men, women, and children -- The traveler leaps free just as the train, battered by the rockslide, plunges off the mountainside. Yet he has not leapt alone, for he had seized in his arms a shy, mute American boy. The Hungarian traveler soon finds himself confronted by a series of disturbing puzzles. Suddenly the mute child speaks fluent Hungarian -- and the grateful boy s father, Dumany, seems already to know intimate details of his child s rescuer s life! And even more disturbing than Dumany -- the American Croesus said to have served the devil -- is his strangely reserved wife.
