From it Aeby derived all the remaining types by reduction and final suppression of the eparterial component on the left side in the vast majority of the living mammalia, or on both sides in the only instance of a bilateral hyperarterial tree then known to exist, Hystrix cristata. Aeby hence regarded the mammalian lung as having undergone, in its modern prevalent type, a process of devolution or regression, to a greater or lesser degree, and his hypothesis can hence be briefly defined as the Reduction Theory. At the time of Aebys publication the embryology of the mammalia and of the vertebrates generally was imperfectly known, and he confidently looked forward to the support of his hypothesis through future ontogenetic investigations. He was disappointed in the first of these when His (24)...
