Over the course of many years, college students have come to me with serious, sincere statements and/or questions referencing writing: I want to begin a diary, or I've started a very short story, and I think I can turn it into a novelette or a novella. I'd like to write a full-length novel. I want to write for magazines; therefore, how do I break into freelancing articles for money? I want to become a journalist. I want to be a poet. I simply want to set down a family history for my children to read one day when I'm old and gray or long gone. I've got some amazing stories to tell. How do I go about writing a blog for bucks? Apart from keeping a personal diary, the student who wishes to set down a family history in the form of a journal needs to be trained-formally or otherwise-because he or she is inevitably looking to be published. A diary generally differs from a journal in that the former is private (for your eyes only) while the latter is usually meant to be read by others. Addressing genres such as fiction, nonfiction, poetry, even blogging for fun and/or exposure, are for all eyes to view and, yes, critique. As such, you would want to put your best foot forward. To do less would be to trip over your own two feet, shortchanging yourself in the bargain. Most assuredly, you are not going to be taken seriously by those in the industry (literary agents, editors, publishers, et cetera) if you do not know how to write and write well. Still, there are some folks who will delude themselves into...
