If you remember, Tom-- something hard rose in her throat, but she gulped it down-- If you remember, I told you that you were perfectly free to choose. But this is all nonsense, he cried. I haven't done a thing except to lose my job. Jane's lips quivered. She fixed her eyes on the wall beyond. Through the mist that dimmed them, glimmered and danced a vision, all in brilliant blue, framed in the dark doorway. Amy's picture had not been lost. The trembling lips drew together into a colorless line. Jane. Her father's voice rasped impatiently from the landing above. Jane's lips parted numbly. I'm afraid-- she panted in a hoarse whisper, and stopped short, seeking for words and tones which should disguise her jealousy and cover up a strange, sudden weakness which shamed her before Tom. When she spoke again, her voice rang in her ears with a curious, conventional coldness. I'm afraid, she repeated, that you still lack--character. She moved forward. Tom stepped aside. Listen, Jane, he cried despairingly. If you leave me like this, I won't be responsible for what I do. She hesitated once again, and again her father's summons sounded. Now she had left the room, and Tom could hear each footfall as she slowly mounted the stairs. He fell into a chair and buried his face in his hands. Very well, if that...
