Excerpt: .in which it was formed, and soon elongates and thickens until its lower end pushes down into the end of Fig.218 An antheridium (a) of a moss. From its tip the sperms (b) are escaping, and one of them is shown enlarged at the side (c). a and b, magnified 350 times; c, magnified 800 times. After Sachs the stem upon which the archeogonium grew. This gives the lower end a foothold in the stem, and by reason of its close contact this end, or foot as it is called, absorbs food material from the stem. The young stalk also bears chlorophyll and may manufacture some of its own food. The upward end elongates rapidly and carries up with it the old archeogonium wall, which meantime has grown somewhat (Figs. 216 and 219). This elongated structure is called the seta, which means a bristle or hair. Since this old archeogonium now changed is like a hood, it is called calyptra, which means hood. Beneath the calyptra, at the end of the seta, there is formed the enlarged capsule. Within the capsule, by division of certain specialized cells, large numbers of spores are formed. At the extreme tip of the capsule, beneath the calyptra, is the mouth, or peristome, which is covered by a lid known as the operculum, meaning the cover or lid. When the spores are ripe the calyptra may fall off and the operculum be thrown off by swelling of the cells...
