La gravity est un mystere du corps invent pour cacher les dfauts de lesprit. La Rochefoucauld. 265. Mb. Hardman was the shopkeeper in the High Street to whom every body went to buy thread and stoves, and quack medicines, and writing paper--he was in truth a general dealer, in the widest sense of the term. After leaving the charity school where he had received his education, he had been apprenticed to the father of his present wife in the very house which he now occupied, and as he turned out a very steady and pains-taking apprentice, his master consented to the marriage with his daughter, and in a few years gave the business up to him. And there had he been, in all but age unaltered, for thirty years the plodding master of that shop, and throughout the whole of that time might he have been seen from seven in the morning till ten in the evening, behind that counter, or in that little counting-house, always the same busy, constant, civil attendant. Not a day did he ever pass from home, nor a night from his own bed. Pleasure was to him a monster, the description of which made him tremble; relaxation a folly that he laughed at; for as getting money was such perfect happiness, how could he see the sense of relaxing from it Oh! that eternal white apron, white cravat, brown coat, and pen in the ear! As constant as...
