Excerpt from Public Schools in Their Relations to the Community: Read at a Meeting of the Association, April 1st, 1880 Heaven from all creatures hides the book of Fate, and it was no doubt well that neither the advocates or the opponents of the constitutional clause of 1776 saw its inevitable result; else it had not been adopted. But to justify that action, we must consider what was at that time the extent of an ordinary English education, and how small a portion of the community received it, in the private schools of the day. The classics and the higher mathematics were seldom studied by those not destined for a learned profession or a college course. Natural Science and Political Economy, as branches of popular knowledge, did not exist; and a very limited acquaintance with Geography and History sufficed for the occasions of most men in those days of little travel and few newspapers. As to Drawing, it was reckoned, with Embroidery and Deportment as an ornamental accomplishment for the very few young ladies schools then exist ing. The modern languages were learned for immediate use by the few adults who had need of them, and singing, in social evening schools, by adolescents. There remained, therefore, really but the instruction in the three R s to be considered when popular education was before the legislature, - providence thus, according to the promise that we shall not be tempted above that we are able, making the first step an easy one. These wonderful R s, little clouds like a, man s hand-they have showered great blessings upon us! Nor is their influence yet spent. The promise and potency of much to come is in...
