Not illustrated. 1907 Excerpt: . . . mathematics, in which this intuitive initiation is not both necessary and possible: we shall let the children practise measuring distances, counting objects; in geometry, we shall develop their imagination by constructive plays. And this preparation through the senses for abstract reasoning in the future will begin very early. Herbart required that even in the child's cradle, different models of triangles should be put before his eyes, the form of which Herbart substituted the triangle for Pestalozzi's square, as elementary geometric form. being made with brightly shining nails, which would attract and fix his gaze. It was perhaps superfluous after Pestalozzi, it certainly is so after Herbart, to recommend intuition and object-lessons. But Herbart has this special merit, that he sets forth clearly in detail every question which he examines; he specifies everything with remarkable exactitude. At this point, for instance, he takes pains to observe that...
