Forgotten Books, 2017. Paperback. Condition: New. Language: English . Brand New Book  Print on Demand . Excerpt from The Museum as an Educator Like everything else, the museum is an evolution. In its infancy it was little more than a collection, open to a few specialists but barred against the general public. The first exhibition marked an era in education. Of course, its promoters had no idea of this; they enjoyed looking at the specimens, they were good-natured and wanted to share their pleasure with other people; that was all. The means at their disposal were inadequate; some dark little rooms, shelves and cases which, fortunately, concealed more than they revealed. Compare this, for instance, with the American Museum of Natural History at New York. It is planned to cover four city blocks and already occupies a great part of two. Four stories are devoted to magnificent exhibition halls, nearly two miles of them, where every case is as nearly perfect as science and art can make it. In truth, the very richness of the place is bewildering; wiser persons go only to one hall, or two. Everywhere you see groups of visitors, quiet people, some fashionably dressed, but there is a good sprinkling of workmen with now and then a bare-footed boy; teachers lead their classes from one object to another; students work with note-book and pencil; here a school boy hangs over some case and perhaps you may see him comparing specimens which he has brought. In these halls the museum has gathered the work of hundreds of skilled men, it has expended years of anxious thought and study and millions of dollars. They are strictly and solely educative. The rooms are not a gift to science; they are a gift from science...
