To complete the circle of seven was not a work of many days. But the circumstances which led up to it were in some respects remarkable. The member of the Brotherhood recommended by Mr. Servetus was Colonel Isaac Risley, a gentleman of mature years and pleasing ways. The other person was Miss Harriet Ames, a maiden lady better known among her friends as Aunt Harriet, because of her numerous personal attachments, especially among the children. Colonel Risley was far advanced in occult learning. He was mirthful, yet seriously in earnest--a sort of sunny temperament at odds with nobody, but genially willing that the more unfavorable things of life should be passed by, for the reason that to him there was vastly more sunshine than shadow in life as he found it. His business was that of an expert civil engineer, and he enjoyed a good patronage and was widely and favorably known. Miss Ames was naturally inclined to mystical teachings, was deeply intuitive, and a most apt reader of human nature. She was a marked character among those who knew her best. Her hair for some reason had turned white in early life, and her face was such as belonged to an aged and fervent soul. Because of some peculiar phase of destiny she had never found her exact mate, since mateship implied so much more to her than it did to the more ordinary classes of women. But..
