 What first suggested the idea of using coins as a general medium in exchange for wares, was no doubt the difficulty of making an equal barter of one commodity for another. This inconvenience would be felt the moment human societies were formed, and this moment was that in which the earth was first peopled. It is supposed by many that the first coins were of metal, because, say they, metals are the only substances which can be divided and formed into single masses again without subtracting much from their original value. We may, perhaps, with some confidence object to this theory. In Iceland at the present day, to baccho and fish are current as money, and though the Danes have introduced their copper and silver coin on the island, yet any article which falls under the value of twelve fish, must be...
