Not illustrated. 1868 Excerpt: .There was a terrific noise in the court-yard outside, and evidently something very exciting was going on. There were runnings to and fro, and a great deal of inharmonious grunting; dogs were barking, cats were mewing, mice were mumbling, cows lowing, donkeys braying, horses neighing, and sheep bleating. Suddenly the noise ceased, all except the grunting, which now seemed close to the door of the Banqueting Room; in a little while it became deafening, and ladies and gentlemen had to use speaking-trumpets to hear it! Angry voices were heard, especially the sonorous tones of the Butcher-General, and presently, when the grunting really seemed as if it would shake down the palace walls, the welcome tingle-tingle was heard. Widely was the door flung open, and in rushed a splendid boar. He sprang on to the table, ran up the nearest passage, shook off his head on to a golden dish, bowed his tail to the king, and ran out of the room backwards. He was followed by a still finer animal, which galloped in, left his head on the dish before Princess Parilla, wagged his loyal respects, and dashed out of the room tail first In came a third, which did as his predecessors, and last of all appeared the finest boar of all, and there was something so peculiar about him that the company stared, and stared, and stared. And why? Why, because there was somebody on his back. How the ladies and gentlemen did laugh...
